

So here we are, the last instalment of me and Maddie's trip to Sweden in the summer. After crossing the country last week and spending a few days on a Baltic island we have returned to the mainland with the intention of following the coast back to the ferry at Trelleborg.

By the time we cleared Kalmar and started our journey south it was already warming up and we made good time. Mad decided to cut a corner to get away from the main road which meant we were able to get a good a good lunch at Torsas. Suitably restored we continued through the forest towards Karlskrona, stopping briefly at Almtalajon which looked really beautiful in the afternoon sun.

Karlskrona is built on an archipelago stretching out into the Baltic and is the home to the Swedish Navy. Neither of us were that impressed so we bought some supplies and continued along the coast to our chosen campsite at Bokenas. Of course, on the way Mad found some archaeology to look at, a rather impressive collection of burial monuments at Vambasa.

After reaching the campsite and eating dinner we spent a couple of hours just chillin', dangling our feet in the fjord under the clear blue sky.
